With the Miami Heat being crowned NBA Champions for the second season in a row, the NBA season has come to an end ushering in the start of the NFL season.

During the NBA season several public outbreaks of violence occurred and the NBA took precautions and altered their security measures. To help ensure safety, patrons attending games were required to show their tickets before being able to proceed to the arena's entrance for security body and bag checks.

The NFL will be following in the footsteps of the NBA and tightening stadium security starting with their preseason games, limiting the size and type of bags fans can bring to the game. With the exception of medically necessary items, bags larger than 12 inches by 6 inches will not be allowed. The league is encouraging fans not to bring any bags to games; these restrictions are designed to enhance security while speeding up entry into stadiums.

Congratulations to the Miami Heat! Bring on football!

Emergency Alert Systems...Are We Oblivious?

We have been taught from an early age what to do in case of an emergency from the good ol' "stop drop and roll" to how to evacuate a building in a single file line, but according to the recent 2012 Federal Signal Public Safety Survey (FSPSS)-some of us have become oblivious to emergency alert systems. Quite naturally this is a problem for all parties involved in responding to emergency situations.

According to the FSPSS, less than 47 percent of participants admitted to being motivated to take action when being in the vicinity of an active emergency alarm system. This could occur for various reasons; the participant could be desensitized to the actual alarm due to experiencing several false notifications or they did not feel personally in danger. In fact, 28 percent of participants admitted to needing to see some type of confirmation, such as a visible fire, a perpetrator, or flood waters.

On Sunday, 19 Arizona Firefighters lost their lives while trying to extinguish a blaze in the small town of Yarnell. When emergency situations occur it is imperative to acknowledge the situation and the emergency alert. Many respondents risk their lives everyday to ensure the safety of the public, and providing assistance by evacuating when necessary assists with allowing them to successfully do their jobs.

Technology Enhances Law Enforcement in Boca Raton

Security 101 is happy to have contributed to such an amazing project with the Boca Raton Police Department.

With more than 200 cameras, license plate recognition and dashboard cameras in patrol cars, to say the Boca Raton, Fla., police have a lot of video to sift through is an understatement; however, thanks to a robust Video Management System (VMS), the city and the police have harnessed video surveillance technology as a useful tool to empower effective law enforcement.

The Boca Raton Police Department has 193 sworn officers and is accredited by the Commission on Accreditation for Law Enforcement (CALEA). An affluent community in South Florida, Boca Raton has 29.1 square miles of total area and a population of 85,000. The city is home to two universities and several high-tech companies.
