IMMERSION TECHNOLOGY IN THE ENTERTAINMENT INDUSTRY

By Melinda Loewenstein

The digital age has broadened the scope of the entertainment field, and the technological developments that have come with it are altering the way films are made and stories are told. Filmmakers, actors, and other creatives should be aware of the changing landscape; two organizations are leading the charge to educate and inspire filmmakers to take the world of film as its been known to a whole new dimension.

Vancouver Film School is betting on the staying power of virtual and augmented reality technology, launching a new VR/AR Design & Development program. Meanwhile, the Cinequest Film & Creativity Festival in San Jose, California, added VR to its lineup three years ago, recognizing the importance of the emerging technology. Both Cinequest and Vancouver Film School have been early embracers of VR's potential to impact the world of storytelling, implementing programs to provide education on the technology while highlighting the opportunities it provides to move the technology further.

"Even though virtual reality has been around since the '90s, the technology and the advances that have been made over the last few years still largely remain unknown by most people," says May Yam, film and VR department manager for the Cinequest festival. Christopher Ian Bennett, executive producer at Vancouver Film School, explains that VR is "a fully immersive and interactive experience usually viewed via a head-mounted display, such as the HTC Vive, or Oculus Rift." VR pairs the simplicity of glasses with the tech of Tony Stark.

Augmented reality is even less known, but if you've played Pokémon Go, you've gotten a taste of that as well. AR or MR (mixed reality) combines computer graphics with an image of the real world; it is real-time visual effects. "These can also be interactive similar to the VR experiences; however, they can also be viewed using mobile devices such as phones and tablets, and also via AR headsets such as HoloLens, Meta 2, and Magic Leap," says Bennett.

Why filmmakers should care about VR and AR.

"It's all about storytelling," says Bennett. "The technology of VR and AR are new ways of storytelling, so these are the skills that are going to be important to filmmakers and creative individuals." Both the VR and AR experiences fall under XR/UX (experiential reality/user experience). Yam notes, "For storytellers, the medium has the ability to replicate the creator's vision perfectly as a real but alternate world, transporting their viewers into a landscape that they can experience, interact with, and feel an emotional tie with."

Vancouver Film School has a variety of programs, including 3-D animation; film and television production; programming for video games, web and mobile; and interactive design, and includes specialized programs like makeup design. Bennett says they felt that VR and AR would be important in moving forward storytelling, not only in film and television, but in real-world applications. Bennett notes that AR is going to play an important role in mobile technology, in addition to its current applications in gaming. "The idea is that in creating this program and giving the students the tools to use the technology, the students will then innovate ways to apply it in the entertainment industry as well as other industries," says Bennett.

Education is important for innovation.

Yam says that when the Cinequest VR program started, it was important to not only showcase the technology, "but also to educate as to what capabilities and what advancements had taken place, but most importantly, ensure that the emerging filmmakers are aware of how to access, use, and maximize this new channel and opportunity in immersive experiences." Cinequest offers attendees a brief education through workshops covering a broad set of topics ranging from the technical reveals of the latest VR hardware to the best ways to craft stories in this new medium. "The programs are usually conducted with a small audience that allows for the presenters to really engage.... Your participation and questions help the speaker tailor each workshop to what you are interested in most," says Yam.

Vancouver Film School's new program will feature a more in-depth intensive education in VR and AR technology. Bennett says the program is a starting place to allow students more avenues to explore the emerging media style. The new eight-month VR/AR Design & Development program will focus on innovative immersive technologies in virtual and augmented reality starting in April 2019. The program will allow students to create VR/AR applications in various sectors, including health care, engineering, tech, education, real estate, and entertainment.

Since the program consisting of 10 courses with two electives is new, Bennett notes that it is still flexible and evolving. "Most schools aren't taking a risk to offer this kind of program. But it's important, because it's not going to go away," says Bennett. The idea is to ensure that students get the education and tools necessary to create, so the program will adjust to meet the students' needs. "The students are going to be breaking barriers for what is possible," he says. Students in the program will use the Unreal and Unity game engines to create a VR/AR experience from the design and research phase to asset creation to programming and production. The goal is to arm students who complete the program with the tools they need to create immersive experiences for the industry of their choice.

The VR/AR students will work with writers, directors, and actors to create programming that utilizes new ways to apply the technology to the film and TV industries. What kind of innovations should viewers expect students to develop? Bennett gives the example of creating a "Harry Potter" movie, which would allow viewers to feel like they are actually walking through the halls of Hogwarts. The goal of the program, he says, is to allow students to innovate in this way.

How VR and AR affects actors.

While the need for filmmakers to understand and innovate using the technology may be more obvious, as VR and AR find ways into the industry, actors will be affected as well. The casting of Andy Serkis as Gollum in “The Lord of the Rings” is the perfect example of how VR technology can eliminate typecasting. VR has the potential to open up endless possibilities for actors.

In addition to opening up roles to different types, it also gives actors the chance to stretch their skills. VR provides the opportunity to deliver a story for a character that has multiple endings. “It’s like those ‘Adventure Time’ books where you choose your own adventure,” says Bennett. “Soon you’ll be able to do that with TV and film.” And actors will have to adapt to play multiple versions of the same character. Netflix recently took the concept for a try with “Black Mirror: Bandersnatch,” an interactive episode of the popular series that allows the viewer to make choices throughout the program. There are other challenges for actors working on VR films. Yam says at last year’s Cinequest Festival, Nicolas Cage’s first VR film was featured. “I remember him telling us about the challenges he had playing to multiple versus solo cameras,” she recalls.

“VR can be seen as the next evolution of flat-screen films,” says Yam. “With developments in VR, actors can be placed into a fanciful scene during the production shoot where they can see the digital world around them, allowing them to act and interact naturally.” That evolution has led to “7 Miracles,” a film based on the Gospel of John from HTC’s Vive Studios and director Rodrigo Cerqueira, which will be screened at the Cinequest Film & Creativity Festival this March.

Learn from the best in the field

Vancouver Film School’s new program is intensive and when students complete it, they are ready to enter the workforce. The advances in technology have only led to more growth and opportunity in the digital sector of the film industry. Bennett says students at VFS are “working with industry professionals and companies from day one” since most of the instructors are also working professionals. The school also has several companies onsite, including the AMD Creator’s Lab, which was built in partnership with the global technology company AMD; on-location filming and live viewing at VFS for long-running show The Electric Playground; and two-day intensive motion capture workshops in partnership with Beyond Capture.

Yam points out that global corporations like Microsoft, Facebook, HTC, and Qualcomm are allocating resources to further the VR technology, and Bennett says that VFS saw the need to give students the tools to take the technology to the next level at these companies and designed the new program to address this need.

“A recent augmented reality startup, Magic Leap, raised $2.3 billion in 2018. Flat-screen films will continue to be the dominant medium for storytelling, but just like smartphones changed the definition of cellphones, VR will forever change how content will be consumed. That future wave is forming now, and filmmakers should understand how to work in both mediums to position themselves for the future,” says Yam.

This year, Cinequest’s VR speaker lineup will include Emmy-nominated creative director Jim Lima, who has worked alongside James Cameron and Steven Spielberg. Yam says she’s looking forward to hearing “the insights he will bring to aspiring VR artists.”

Cinequest Film & Creativity Festival runs March 5–17 in San Jose, California. Tickets to the festival (including the VIP pass which gives attendees access to the VR Experience program) can be purchased at cinequest.org.

Potential students can learn more about Vancouver Film School’s new VR/AR Design & Development program at vfs.edu.

CASTING DIRECTORS: HOW TO USE THIS LIST IN SIX SIMPLE STEPS

Step One: Find out who is casting the projects that are right for you. Read through the “Production Listings” on www.backstage.com/resources to find the most up-to-date production listings for your area. (Online listings also include theater, so make sure you click on the appropriate links.) Highlight any productions you would be interested in, whether they are currently shooting or not. Then, do a search of other casting opportunities at www.backstage.com/casting to find more opportunities that might be right for you. Once you have a list of productions you are interested in, make a list of the casting directors linked to each project. Make note of any casting directors that are linked to more than one project that you find interesting. Are there any casting directors that seem to be doing a lot of casting for a specific network or director? Take note of any patterns or correlations that you see.

Step Two: Note the credits and who they represent. In addition to the list you made from Step One, go through the Call Sheet list of casting directors, and look at each listing’s credits. Are there any projects listed here that you are particularly interested in? If no credits are listed, look at the types of performers they cast. Do you fit into this category? If you are interested in both film and commercial work, it may be good to star the listings that cast both, as you may discover more than one opportunity if you are able to audition for them. Note that many of the listings have more than one casting director on staff. Make sure you know which casting director casts the projects you are interested in. Also, it may be worth paying attention to who the casting associates are, as they may be the people who initially bring you in for an audition.

Step Three: Follow the submission policy. Take note of each listing’s submission policy. It is very important to follow this policy exactly when submitting for any project. If you found a casting director through an online casting call, always follow the policy listed for the specific project rather than the more general policy listed in our directory. If you have an agent or manager, make sure they are aware of your interest in this specific casting director, and that he or she knows how they would like to be approached as well. Submit a professional headshot and résumé, along with a cover letter explaining why you are interested in working with them. You can highlight why their work is of particular interest to you, and how your background lends itself to similar projects. Make sure to invite them to any performances you have coming up, as you never know when they might be available to attend.

TALENT AGENCIES: HOW TO USE THIS LIST IN SIX SIMPLE STEPS

STEP ONE: Determine what kind of agent you want. Different agencies specialize in different things. Some agencies cast a lot of commercials, some work in television, and others focus on modeling. Highlight the agents that specialize in your chosen field(s). Also take note of the age range they represent to make sure you fit within their specifications.

STEP TWO: Go to their website. Read about the history of the agency. How long have they been in business? Do they have offices in multiple cities or countries? Some of them have sections spotlighting their clients. See if these people are at a similar place in their career. Many of the websites also have a section that lists their recent bookings. This tells you with whom they are connected and where their clients are getting work.

STEP THREE: Take note of their union and organization affiliations. If they are SAG-AFTRA franchised, this means that they comply with SAG-AFTRA guidelines, and you can contact the union with any inquiries. Also take note of any trade organizations they are a part of, such as the Association of Talent Agents (ATA) and the National Association of Talent Representatives (NATR). Members of such organizations may be licensed and regulated by state and local agencies, or have agreements with actor unions such as the Actors' Equity Association. Research any affiliations with which you are unfamiliar.

STEP FOUR: Scan their list of personnel to zero in on the specific agent with whom you would want to meet. Many agencies have a few different departments, so make sure you are talking to the person in your desired field. Once you have a short list of agencies and names, do additional research on the individual agents. Many of them write blogs, have been interviewed, or have been featured in articles. Read anything the agent has said regarding their work and whom they like to represent. These resources may include tips as to what the agent is looking for in a submission.

STEP FIVE: Read the submission policy carefully. After making sure your headshot and résumé are professionally generated and up-to-date, take special note of the agency's submission policy. While some agencies ask for online submissions, others still prefer hard copies to be mailed in. Follow the instructions carefully. Do not call or visit the agency if their policy asks you not to. Also take note of which agents accept postcards and invitations. Put their name and address on a list, and invite them to your next live performance or screening.

STEP SIX: Send out your materials. After finding out how the agent would like to receive communications, print out a cover letter asking for a meeting. Make sure this letter is specific to the individual agent. Let them know why you are perfect for their agency in particular, and what details about their work interest you. If at all possible, invite them to see your next performance, and offer them free tickets to the event. Make sure that they know that you are actively searching for and creating opportunities yourself (giving examples if possible), but would welcome their help in booking additional auditions and jobs in the industry. Thank them for their time, and attach your professional headshot and résumé.

TALENT MANAGERS: HOW TO USE THIS LIST IN SIX SIMPLE STEPS

Step One: Find out who each manager represents. Once you have narrowed down your list to managers in your area, highlight those who represent your desired medium. Many managers represent both film and theater actors, but some specialize in a specific area. Make sure they are familiar with the type of work you are interested in. Also note the ages represented and any additional information in the comment sections, as some managers have listed a specific type of client they are seeking at this time.

Step Two: Take note of how each manager would like to receive submissions. While some prefer materials to be emailed, other prefer hard copies. Do not call or visit the management company if they do not wish you to do so. Instead, follow their submission policy exactly to ensure that you make a good first impression.

Step Three: Send in your materials. Send each manager a professional cover letter, headshot, and résumé, and attach a demo reel if you have one. In the cover letter, make sure to address which manager you are interested in working with and why, based on the research that you have done. You may want to say why it is the right time in your career to begin working with a manager, and how you feel a manager would add to your growth and success. You may also want to briefly address your strengths and personality as an artist. Make sure to invite him or her to any upcoming projects.

Additional Tip: Prepare a list of questions for any meetings. A good manager is interested in the overall trajectory of your career. They will want to know where you came from, what your goals are, and how you are working to achieve those goals. A manager should be able to evaluate your career not only by the work you get, but also by how your work is received, how it is publicized, and how you can use it to leverage the next opportunity. Your manager should be aware of any presence you have online, and how those who see it are interpreting that presence. As a result, it is important for actors to have a list of questions prepared to ask the manager with whom they are meeting. This ensures that they are finding the right person to represent them publicly and professionally.

PRODUCTION COMPANIES: HOW TO USE THIS LIST IN SIX SIMPLE STEPS

STEP ONE: Narrow down which companies may be interested in your work. Look through the Production Types listed under each company to see what type of work they typically do. For example, if you have an idea or script for a new film, you might not want to send it to 495 Productions, since they typically produce animation, TV series, and reality TV. Find a company that primarily produces feature films instead. Zero in on the companies that would be the best fit for your project.

STEP TWO: Find the company that fits your project's style and medium. Look through the Credits listed under each company to see what style of work they typically produce. For example, let's say that one of the companies on your list is Thunder Road Pictures. In their list of credits, they have films such as "Wrath of the Titans" (the ancient Greek story of Perseus and his journey to the treacherous underworld to rescue his father, Zeus), "The Town" (a film about a bank thief who attempts to rectify his feelings for a bank manager and his need to dodge the FBI), and "Brooklyn's Finest" (the story of three unconnected Brooklyn cops who end up at the same deadly location after following vastly different paths in their careers). If the film you are pitching is a romantic comedy about a female librarian, this company might not be for you.

STEP THREE: Pay attention to how the company wants you to submit your work. Carefully read the Submission Policy. Take note of the following details: Do they prefer full scripts or treatments? Do they prefer digital submissions or hard copies? Do they accept unsolicited scripts? Do they only accept submissions from agents? Do they allow you to drop off your submission in person? Make sure you follow their policies exactly, as submitting your script in the wrong format may result in it never getting read! Also, make sure that if email submissions are preferred, you are sending your work to the correct address. Some companies list more than one email address, so take note if there is one specifically set aside to receive submissions.

STEP FOUR: Browse the company's website. If you are having trouble determining any of the information above from just the list, visit the company's website and look around. Learn more about the history of the company. Find out how long they have been in business and how often they produce. Visit their Facebook page or start following them on Twitter. You never know what you might find that could give you the edge over someone else when sitting down to your first meeting.

STEP FIVE: Study the company's list of personnel. Look at the names listed under Staff to become familiar with the people you may be dealing with. That way, if you do get to speak with anyone, you will know their names and the names of the people they may be referring to. It may behoove you to send your submission to the email address of an assistant. If an assistant likes your script, he or she may move it to the top of the stack on the VP's desk! We recommend only sending your work to the executives of the company as a last resort. While there is a small chance something might catch their eye, an actor's time is valuable, and you want to make sure that your hard work is being read by someone, instead of getting shuffled aside right away.

STEP SIX: Send out thank-you emails. Use the Email addresses listed to drop a note to anyone you've met along the way, thanking them for taking the time, and asking if there is anything else you can send along.

Director), Pierre Pandey (Volunteer Outreach/Programs Coordinator), Jessica Alvarez (L.A. County Arts Commission Intern), Curtis Baxter (Interim Programs Director)

Policy: Los Angeles-based foundation that serves both Los Angeles and New York with programs for kids starting at the 5th grade and going through college. Semester-long and year long common core-aligned program where students write original scripts and then see them performed by professional actors. Also has a program that offers a pitch and screening of student-made films.

Comments: Our mission is simple: we inspire young people to discover the power of their voice. Using one-on-one mentorship, low-income students learn how to write original stories and see them brought to life on stage and film. Thanks to thousands of volunteer mentors, actors, and professional teaching artists, we serve more than 60 public schools in Los Angeles and New York City, reaching 1,200 students in elementary, middle, and high school each year.
