

Decision making in complexity...

VIRTUAL WORKSHOP

Leaders and their teams need to be able to discern between different types of challenges, and to choose the most appropriate approach to solving them. Dedicating early effort and energy to getting the approach right can save unnecessarily wasting time and resources.

Recognising and distinguishing between types of problems is particularly important as our organisations move into the recovery phase. There will be a strong desire for decision-making to speed up so as to re-energise economies and organisations. Yet hasty decisions can be problematic too. It is all about getting the right people together to ask the right types questions to progress the problem.

“Out of intense complexities, intense simplicities emerge.”
Winston Churchill

This workshop helps leaders:

- Determine which decisions can be made quickly within the team, and which require an alternate approach.
- Know how to approach decisions in emerging situations that feel very complex and chaotic.
- Remain aware of pitfalls to different approaches, including leader and organisational biases.
