

MOBILE PEER-TO-PEER PAYMENTS

Context

As has been well reported, the financial services industry is undergoing a dramatic transformation. FinTech (or financial technology) is changing the way we spend, save, sell, invest, and lend. From crowdfunding to personal finance, this $707B industry is growing, both in size and in scope.

Peer-to-peer mobile payments are still a relatively modest $28B sector within this industry, but we believe they are on the cusp of mainstream adoption. At 82 million users, at least one in four adults in the U.S. is expected to send money to a friend, colleague, or family member this way in 2016. That's nearly half of all smartphone users in the U.S. (190M), which happens to coincide with roughly the entire population of millennials in the U.S. (83M). Given MBLM's interest in brand relationships in the digital age, and the millennial generation's role as a technology bellwether, we felt it was time for a Field Notes edition focused on the firsthand experience and assessment of this intriguing category.

Challenge

We tested the mobile applications of six key players to evaluate the user experience of each app, based on ease of sign-up and use, how much we felt we could trust them, how many of our friends were using them, and how much we enjoyed the payment process. We spent a week taking the different services through their paces, determined to declare a winner.

Venmo is the youngest of the six brands we tested, but it has quickly become a favorite in mobile P2P among millennials. It became a part of PayPal when the FinTech pioneer acquired Braintree for $26.2 million.
