

How to Get Along Around Here

"OUR CULTURE STATEMENTS MUST REFLECT
WHAT WE ACTUALLY BELIEVE, AND THE PROOF WILL BE OUR BEHAVIOR."

HOW TO GET ALONG AROUND HERE

“Martin, I’m going to do it today.”

“Do what?”

“Let him go.”

“I thought you were going to talk to me about it.”

“I AM talking to you about it.”

This was a conversation with a business coaching client from several years ago. The owner was talking about firing his sales manager. His mind was made up, and despite our short conversation, he terminated him that afternoon.

When I began coaching the company, the owner and sales manager had been together for about three years. The sales manager had been instrumental in growing revenues from near zero to millions in that time. There was no theft, no discipline problem, and no insubordination involved.

But there was definitely a culture conflict.

The sales manager was ex-military, gregarious, told a lot of jokes, and flew jets on weekends. He worked on his own schedule as he moved prospects through the sales funnel, and he was good at it.

The owner and the rest of the team were noticeably reserved. The team was very young, spent structured days facing computer screens doing defined tasks, and knew little or nothing about the art of selling. The result was a culture conflict that resulted in a termination which slowed sales for a considerable time.

CULTURE DEFINED

Any time two or more people come together, a culture develops, either by default or design. Design is better.

There is a saying in business that we “Hire for skill and fire for behavior.” I believe that’s true and the reason is that we know how to look for specific skills, but not for undefined behaviors.

Instead, we rely on gut feel or recommendations from former employers who are scared to say anything for fear of lawsuits. Few of us have given thought to designing a culture, looking for compatible hires, and to letting them know “How to get along around here.”

CULTURE DESIGNED

Designing our culture begins with clarifying our values in a written culture statement. Think of a culture statement as an expression of the attributes of a perfect employee who is completely aligned with our values. It has to start with us because if we aren’t clear in our own minds, our teams cannot possibly be clear in theirs.

Creating a culture statement is a three-step process:

LIST VALUES

We begin by listing, in writing, the values most important to us. Think about author Brian Tracy’s, definition of values: “Those things we believe to be right, good and worthwhile.”

For example:

- Communication
- Honesty
- Accommodation
- Balance

For an extended list of values, visit Brian Tracy's site: <http://bit.ly/2rGZMTZ>

EXPAND WITH EXPLANATION

The next step is to expand on the values we've chosen to refine the meaning. Think of employees who do things right, who just seem to "get it." What do they do that can be used as examples of behavioral standards? We can use their behaviors to illustrate our values and make our intentions clear.

For example:

- Communication
  - I keep my commitments and communicate as soon as possible if I cannot.
  - If I am in doubt about the status of a project, I reach out for clarification, I do not wait for others to reach out to me.
  - I do not assume, but rather ensure that I understand instructions clearly by repeating them back to the speaker.
  - I ensure that written correspondence, including email, texts, faxes, and all forms electronic or paper documents contain correct grammar, punctuation and spelling. If I am in doubt, I ask.
  - I do not participate in gossip or discuss complaints or issues with people who cannot affect them.

Great culture statements will contain the five to ten values most important to us.

REFINE AND INSTILL

Once our culture statements are written, the next step is to refine them and instill them in our organizations by using them for:

- HIRING

To clarify the behavioral traits we value which enables us to look for them when hiring. To see how, read my article "How to Hire the Right People."

- DEVELOPMENT

As tools for employee development workshops. A useful exercise is to discuss one value in a team meeting. Have employees discuss what it means to them and to have them give examples. They will self-define the meaning and we will have the chance to refine our statement and to clear up any misinterpretations.

- EVALUATIONS

As a means to evaluate employees on otherwise subjective criteria.

A WORD OF CAUTION

The words "Integrity, Communication, Respect and Excellence" were visible on the lobby walls at Enron as police led company officers out of the building in handcuffs. The words did not represent the true values of the company - or at least of top management.

Our culture statements must reflect what we actually believe, and the proof will be our behavior. Platitudes are at best are ignored and at worst lead to cynicism as people observe the difference between what we say and how we act.

We have to get it right.

Until we do, we are better off without a culture statement.

AN IMPORTANT DISTINCTION: PERSONALITY VS. VALUE CONFLICT

Brian Tracy also said about values that they "...are non-negotiable. They define the things we stand for, and more importantly, the things we won't stand for."

We are our values.

Extensive research by the Gallup Organization, as reported by Buckingham and Coffman in their book "First Break all the Rules," has shown people do not change their values easily.

The problems at Enron had deep-seated roots in the values of the company leadership. We cannot expect people who have totally self-serving values to change, and they didn't. The problems of my client and his sales manager did not rise to that level.

I like both the owner and the sales manager. They are both great people whom I know share similar values, including honesty, people and family. The cultural problems at the company were on the level of personality conflict rather than value conflicts.

Personality conflict can lead to serious problems, but behaviors due to personality can change, if and only if all parties share similar values such as people, communication, good-will, and accommodation.

HOW ABOUT YOU?

How about you? How would it affect your business if everyone knew "How to get along around here?" What are your top ten values? What does your team value? How could you use a clear culture statement in your business?

If you have any further questions, please don't hesitate to mail me at

Martin@annealbc.com or visit www.annealbc.com

Martin Holland

Martin Holland is the son of a successful entrepreneur. He grew up hearing about margins and markets, R&D and sales, risk and return on investment. He learned to love the language and rigors of business and grew to believe that business is both the most human of all endeavors and the highest calling. After selling a company in 2011, Martin became a coach in order to help other owners build profitable businesses that do not require their day-to-day involvement.

A native of Norman, Martin earned a B.A. degree from Hastings College in Hastings, Nebraska and a Masters in Business Administration degree from the University of Oklahoma. Over the past 7 years he has written business plans that have raised over $52.4 million in bank and investor financing. He has helped 157 (and counting) business owners reduce stress and increase performance through clarity of purpose, better marriages, more money, and more free time away from the business.