

NEW JERSEY STATE MANDATE

What You Need to Know

► WHAT IS IT?

On June 11th, 2019, New Jersey Governor Phil Murphy signed S2986 into law, which will require hotels with over 100 guest rooms to provide panic devices in order to protect hotel employees from violent acts, such as sexual assault and sexual harassment, while performing housekeeping duties.

Due to the unique nature of hotel work, hotel employees are particularly vulnerable to unsafe working conditions because they often work alone in hotel guest rooms, which sometimes may be occupied. This solitary work places them at risk of assault, including sexual assault, and sexual harassment. However, some hotel employers have not adequately addressed the safety concerns of hotel employees.¹

All hotel employers in New Jersey shall provide a panic button device to each hotel employee assigned to work in a guest room without any other employees present, at no cost to the employee.¹

State lawmakers in Florida, Illinois, and Washington are considering similar measures, and some hotels like Marriott and Hilton have announced plans to provide workers with the devices on their own.

“Hotel” meaning any hotel, inn, boarding house, motel or other establishment whose proprietor offers and accepts payment for rooms, sleeping accommodations or board and lodging and retains the right of access to, and control of, the premises which are let, which contains at least 25 guest rooms.²

This is one of those technologies where hopefully no one ever uses it, but if it does get used, it has to work. From a technology standpoint, there's a lot of redundancy built into it. For example, our Bluetooth hubs create the coverage throughout the property, there's always overlapping coverage, so if one's offline or something is broken, there's redundancy.
